Somewhere among Times' articles...

It happened on a cold October 1986. The man suffered from a mild form of paranoia, his wife knew this, and, as we will find out later, perhaps he was not so paranoid. Later identified as Alex Moss, he was 34 years old. Alex was sure that the mysterious tailed “they” were after him — and “they” wanted to harm him. The family treated his oddities with understanding but did not particularly trust his stories. Once, in a conversation with his wife, Moss have seen several dark figures walking around his house on the day. Though at the time they felt that it was a game of shadows. He wrote six letters “PISTA” on a piece of paper, crossed them out and ran out of the house closer to midnight. However, he did not go far — to his favourite bar “Ellipsis”. There he became ill, and he fainted, although all the bar regulars later assured the police that Alex was not drunk. The fainting did not stop him — that same night, Alex went to his hometown somewhere in the wilderness of Texas, where he tried to get into the house of his former neighbour, assuring her that something terrible was about to happen that very night. And he turned out to be right: ahead was the mysterious unsolved murder of Moss himself.

At three o'clock in the morning, two truck drivers called the police and said that 100 kilometres from Alex's hometown they saw his car and a grey-skinned man in a light jacket standing next to it. It looks like he was hurt. The car belonged to Alex, except that the man in the jacket was not him. The body was found in a critical condition in the back seat of his car — completely naked. He was delirious, saying that he was beaten for things he could not talk about and beaten by the very creatures he met earlier that were with him in the same car. On the way to the hospital, Alex died, and the cold case became a murder case.

It is noteworthy that the autopsy showed that death did not result from beatings at all, but, most likely, as a result of a car accident — Alex was hit by a car, and later unknown persons placed him in the passenger seat of his car.

What the mysterious letters meant is still unknown — Alex took this secret with him to the grave, and his murder remained unsolved.
